DESCRIPTION (Continued)

17 OTHER NOTABLE FEATURES OF BUILDING OR SITE (interior and/or exterior)

This house has a three-bay facade with a central entry protected by a one-story porch with a two-and-one-half story entry bay topped by a pedimented peak. The central entry is flanked by two semi-hexagonal bays. Windows are generally fitted with 1-over-1 sash. The full-width porch is supported on fluted square posts; a framed-in portion with 8-pane casement windows wraps around the left corner of the house. Above the porch is a balustrade; the central entry pavilion features a second-floor apron with decorative wood shingles, a radial-glazed semi-circular fanlight and fishscale shingles in the peak. The main roof gables on both side elevations show a wide, plain frieze above a narrow molding, imbricated shingles, a Palladian attic light, and a framed-in peak with a sunburst design.

SIGNIFICANCE

18 ARCHITECT

BUILDER

19 HISTORICAL OR ARCHITECTURAL IMPORTANCE

Architecturally, this house is significant as an interesting example of a dwelling probably dating from the early 19th century but subjected to an idiosyncratic Victorian remodelling. The ridge-parallel orientation, tall profile, and simple rectangular plan all point to early 19th-century origins, but the semi-hexagonal bays, porch detailing, and decorated gable peaks are all typical of Victorian Vernacular architecture. The characteristic decorative woodwork of this style was made affordable by 19th century advances in wood-forming technology.

Oliver D. Kent, who listed his occupations as carpenter (the modern equivalent would be "builder") and farmer, probably remodelled this house in the last years of the 19th century before selling it to Otto and Eva Youngblad (also seen as Jungblad) in 1905. Kent, extremely active in the late 19th-century real-estate market, bought and sold numerous parcels in Berlin.
